Baseball Games On The Field Have Been Terrific / Off Field Issues Persist
Opinions Regarding A Player's Abilities Vary Greatly With Little Common Ground
By Tom Prendergast

One of the best things about playing in the MSBL WS, are the options we offer for players with different levels of skills. We have divisions for the really good players and the not so good players - with several levels in between. In addition we separate these by age group, which seems to make sense. Our Father and Son divisions are the crown jewel of the MSBL WS and it's a special time when dads and sons can be teammates in the sport they grew up enjoying together. We rely heavily on the managers to police this and bring players on their rosters that are suitable to the level of play that they requested to participate in. Most teams get this right, but some teams bring questionable choices. For example: if a player is drafted by an MLB team and receives $100,000 signing bonus - he's going to be a couple of notches above the player who got a job at the local hardware store out of high school and plays in a local league on the weekends. Without even seeing either one of these players in a game, I would bet the bonus boy will be the one hitting bombs off the Tempe Diablo Stadium wall. It's hard to understand the logic of placing these two players in the same division. While you can make a compelling argument for this (the player wants to play with his dad), the solution here is to have the dad play up. Well maybe that's not fair to his dad, because he doesn't have the same skills as his son. OK, but it's not fair to the other teams dads who don't have those skills either. Bottom line here - if it looks like a duck and quacks like a duck - it's a duck!
